Improving the Utilization of Patient Portals Paul S. Weiss, 2013 To continue to receive incentives and to avoid possible future fees MediCorp continues to strive to meet or exceed all requirements presented by Meaningful Use, a medical policy. One of many requirements is to provide patients unlimited access to basic health information including the latest test results, lists of prescription medicines, and current conditions. In order to qualify, MediCorp must show that this service is being provided. The measure by which this is done is based on the percentage of patients cared for by MediCorp that are currently registered for the patient portal. Through alterations to current processes and procedures MediCorp strives to promote the portal by showing patients the benefits of registering for the portal. Analysis provided in this study, for one possible process improvement, shows indicators to look for that will show if a newly designed process is actually making an impact on portal registrations.

Theory-informed Design and Evaluation of Online Patient Portal Multimedia Instructional Materials for Older Adults Yuqi He, 2019 Patient portals are recognized as one of the most important tools to solve the challenges of accessing and managing personal health information and support greater patient engagement. The growing aging population could greatly benefit from using patient portals because of the prevalence of chronic conditions and high medication use, and therefore a more pressing need for ongoing health information management and self-management of conditions. However, older adults are lagging behind other age groups on portal enrollment and portal use. One critical barrier to portal adoption is lack of training. Research has shown that older adults desire instructional support for using portals and prior studies have identified portal training as a primary means to reduce barriers to portal adoption among the older adult population as well as the general population; nevertheless, little portal training is provided by health care organizations to patients. This dissertation seeks to bridge the gap on designing and evaluating instructional support for current patient portal technology, particularly in the older adult population, through a series of three studies: a focus group, an instructional design study, and a controlled experimental study. Specifically, focus group interviews were employed to understand older adults' current use and learning needs of patient portals, a theory-informed design process was used for creating patient portal instructional materials, and controlled experiments were applied to examine the effectiveness of these instructional materials. This research applied instruction theories to a new domain problem -- patient portals and expanded the existing limited understanding of patient portal training among older adults, Results from this research strongly suggest that carefully designed patient portal instructional materials are effective in improving older adults' knowledge and confidence in using patient portals, and boosting their task success and perceived usability of a portal website. Future studies are needed to test the portal training effects using a larger ethnically diverse sample.
